There has been a consistent, well-funded effort to discredit public education, and to replace it with a privatized "choice" system. The proponents of privatized "choice" refer to public schools as government schools, and believe that only free market principles and competition can improve educational outcomes.

Through their advocacy of charter schools, online schools, voucher schools as well as neo-vouchers funding schemes, such as Educational Savings Accounts and tax credit scholarships, the proponents of this market-based approach have three objectives--put the education of our nation's students in private hands, fund religious education and educate students at the lowest possible cost. Carol Burris, will describe the concerted efforts to privatize public education and how this will impact federal policy.

Carol Burris is the Executive Director of the Network for Public Education. She served as principal of South Side High School in Rockville, NY and was recognized by New York School Administrators Association as their Outstanding Educator of the Year (2010) and as High School Principal of the Year (2013). Carol has authored/co-authored three books and numerous journal articles on educational equity, teacher evaluation and detracting. She is a frequent guest blogger for the Answer Sheet of the Washington Post.
